Dan Martin is a junior political science major who was raised in a religious home. He balances school with two part-time jobs and hopes after college to enter a field where he can help others lead better lives.

Douglas McNeil is working toward a master's degree in counseling while holding a full-time job as a chemist in a Phoenix laboratory. He also was raised in a religious home and hopes that after completing his studies he can enter a field where he can help others.

While the two may seem to be average students with comparable interests, their similarities end sharply at the Danforth Chapel door.

McNeil refuses to go in the building that Martin considers a second home until the cross that rests on its roof is torn down.

"I belong to a group that has been specifically excluded (from the building) by those who have taken a meditation chapel and put a religious symbol on it," McNeil said. "I do not feel comfortable walking into the building and knowing I have been overlooked and ignored."

Martin said he believes no group should feel oppressed by the symbol.

"The architecture of the building includes a cross. It's foolish to take it down," Martin said. "I don't think it (the cross) can hurt anyone."

ASASU meets with board on fees proposal

By NICOLE CARROLL

Associated Students of ASU officials met with the chairman of the Arizona Board of Regents Resources Committee Monday in a final attempt to solicit support for the Arizona Students Association tuition hike proposal.

ASASU President Paul Larson said the meeting with Regent Jack Pfister was positive and that the ASA tuition proposal was being seriously considered by the board.

"I feel very good about the COE (cost of education formula) reform," Larson said. "I think we'll be successful with it."

He added that ASA's proposal to exempt current non-resident students from large tuition hikes was receiving a mixed response from the regents.

Larson

The board will vote on the tuition hike during its Feb. 16 meeting in Tucson.

Representatives of ASA have been meeting with board members on an individual basis for the past week, lobbying them with student concerns.

"I think that it's helping make our position more clear to the regents," ASA Executive Director Brad Golich said.

"I feel like they're saying 'yes we understand, but there is a fiscal crisis going on,'" he added.

ASA has proposed that tuition be raised $58 for in-state students and $276 for currently enrolled non-resident students at ASU and UofA. The group also recommends that incoming out-of-state students be responsible for 100 percent of the cost of their education, a $968 increase over current levels.

The Council of Presidents proposed that the regents adopt either a $116 or $152 resident fee increase and a $856 or $1,000 non-resident tuition hike for all students.

Both of the groups based their recommendations on students paying for a percentage of the total cost of their education. The difference in the numbers is created because the two groups cannot decide on what the cost of a state university education actually is.

Larson said ASA and the regents will compromise on how to estimate education costs at the board meeting on Friday.

Mecham supports tuition hike, blasts government waste

By HOBART ROWLAND
State Press

Former Gov. Evan Mecham said he supports a tuition increase for Arizona's universities in a question and answer session following a speech in which he stressed the importance of local government.

Mecham's speech, described by one Tempe city official as "typical Mecham," was delivered to about 60 people Monday night at Tempe's Pyle Center.

"He knows all the catch phrases and makes the answers sound so simple," Tempe City Councilman Frank Plencner said after the speech, which was sponsored by Tempe Tomorrow, a local community action group.

Mecham said tuition for the state's universities must gradually increase each year if the quality of education is to improve. Out-of-state students, he said, should not be exempt from the policy.

"Our taxpayers spend too much money to educate students from states like Connecticut," Mecham told the predominantly older audience. "(These students) can come to Arizona and go to school cheaper than in their own states."

Mecham, who was the first governor to face a recall, criminal charges and an impeachment proceeding simultaneously, was impeached by the Arizona Senate on April 4, 1988.

The 1990 gubernatorial candidate began his speech by pointing out that Arizonans must view the state objectively to predict where Arizona will be in the future.

Mecham also said that if the government continues to waste money in overhead and to tax itself out of the market for potential outside industry, the state's economy will continue to suffer.

"It pains me to say that very few businesses will find Arizona a suitable location," he said.

Without the sound financial base outside corporations can provide, Mecham said, there will be nothing to lure people to Arizona because of the lack of jobs.

"And if Arizona goes," he predicted, "most of Tempe will go right along with it."

Aside from the state's economic crisis, Mecham said problems with crime, education and high taxes are the result of self-serving leadership.

"The powerful people desire to run this state as their own fiefdom," he said.

Mecham said that when he became governor in 1986, the

Sex abstinence program backfires

Research shows that students in program have increased sex

By KRISTIE YOUNG
State Press

ASU researchers found that "Just Say No" to sex programs do not work for Phoenix teenagers when an abstinence-only sex-education program backfired.

F. Scott Christopher, an assistant professor of family resources and human development, in connection with Mark Roosa, the department's associate director, conducted ASU's first evaluation of 320 Phoenix teenagers for the Maricopa County YWCA.

"The program was a demonstration project under the 1981 Adolescent Family Life Act, which required a university-based evaluation," Christopher said.

The results of the evaluation showed that on the average, the 191 teenage participants had actually increased in their sexual activity, when compared to the 129 members of a control group who did not participate in the program.

The results of increased sexual activity was greater for teen-age boys than girls and applied mostly to those who had been virgins before the program began.

Also, no changes in family communication, age expected to first have sex, attitudes toward best age to marry, level of self-esteem or premarital sex attitudes were reported.

The evaluation found that 41 percent of the participants dropped out of the program.

Christopher said these dropouts were "at a greater risk of becoming pregnant" or impregnating other students.

"A lot of the students thought the program was a joke," Christopher said. "The ones who were most apt to have (sexual encounters) were the ones who dropped out."

"These figures show that the abstinence-only sex-education program is too simplistic — it may even put adolescents at a greater risk for pregnancy," Christopher said.

He said that the social policy of the Adolescent Family Life Act, whose major objective is to decrease teen pregnancy rates, needed to be re-examined.

"We must recognize that some students are already sexually active," Christopher said. "The current policy only allows for the funding of abstinence programs," he said adding that a program containing access to birth control information and contraceptives would be more successful in combating teen pregnancy.

The "Success Express Program" was implemented by the YWCA to fight the problem of teen-age pregnancies.

It was funded by a $47,000 matching grant from the National Institute of Health's Office of Adolescent Parenting Programs. This grant included about $5,000 to help finance the ASU evaluation.

"The whole purpose of the sex education program is to evaluate the program itself — to see if this type of research is successful or not," Christopher said.

"Success Express" was implemented to target low-income, primarily minority sixth and seventh-graders, with the average age being just under 13.

It consisted of six one-hour sessions held each week. The sessions included discussions of family values, adolescent growth in terms of reproductive knowledge, sexual pressures encountered, how to assertively say no, negative outcomes of teen sexual activity and how to make future plans.

Owen Morgan, an ASU professor of family resources and human development, said that the goal of the evaluations should concern the issue of responsibility.

"I wouldn't be interested in whether sexual activity increased or decreased among the participants," he said. "Sex education and behavior based on knowledge is much better than education and behavior based on ignorance. The emphasis should be placed on decision-making and being aware of consequences."

Christopher said the results of the evaluation were compiled a year ago by the YWCA and ASU researchers.

He "wanted to make sure the information was published in a scientific journal to undergo peer reviews" before the information was released to the public.

The article appeared in the January issue of Family Relations.

The nation's average total of teen-aged pregnancies has been more than 1 million a year in the last decade.

In Arizona, a total of 12,385 pregnancies were reported in 1988 among those 10 to 19 years old.

Mandela defends violence against apartheid

Armed clashes with police mark black leaders release

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa (AP) — Nelson Mandela said Monday he seeks a South Africa that is fair to both whites and blacks, and he insisted that violence against apartheid is justified.

The 71-year-old black leader, enjoying his first full day of freedom after 27 years in prison, defended the policies of his African National Congress but said talks with the government could be held soon.

In the tribal homeland of Ciskei, 10 blacks celebrating Mandela's release Sunday night were shot and killed by police, and 20 were injured, according to the Daily Dispatch newspaper in nearby East London. Homeland authorities refused to comment, and civil rights groups demanded a judicial inquiry.

In Mandela's hometown of Soweto, schools were deserted as thousands of students marched and danced in the streets, anticipating his return home. Believing Mandela was due back for an afternoon rally, tens of thousands of Sowetans crammed into a soccer stadium, and dozens were injured in the crush.

Hundreds of youths heading home from the stadium surrounded a police van and freed 13 prisoners inside, according to Gen. Herman Stadler, a police spokesman. He said the officers in the vehicle decided not to use their firearms, and no injuries were reported.

The activists making arrangements for Mandela decided he should not re-enter Soweto until Tuesday, when a massive welcoming rally was planned. They refused to disclose where he would spend the night, although television networks deployed helicopters to pursue him.

"I am absolutely excited to be out," Mandela told reporters in Cape Town before taking an evening flight to Johannesburg. He was released unconditionally on Sunday.

Mandela said negotiations between the ANC and the government could begin "very soon" if President F.W. de Klerk continues his peace initiative and makes further reforms.

"The state of emergency has to be lifted in its entirety and political prisoners have to be released," Mandela told more than 200 journalists assembled on the lawn outside the official residence of Anglican Archbishop Desmond Tutu in Cape Town.

At a news conference in Washington on Monday, President Bush expressed optimism Monday that Mandela's release was a sign the Pretoria government was "at last" on the way to ending apartheid, but Bush showed no inclination to move quickly to lift U.S. economic sanctions.

He noted that he had invited both Mandela and de Klerk to the White House — separately, with no times yet fixed — and wanted to discuss sanction provisions with them.

Andries Treurnicht, leader of the pro-apartheid Conservative Party, accused the de Klerk government of falling victim to "Mandela hysteria" and moving toward white surrender. Eugene TerreBlanche, leader of the neo-

Security plans prepared for Colombian summit

WASHINGTON (AP) — A massive security operation is being assembled to protect President Bush and three Latin leaders from danger during a day-long drug summit in violence-racked Colombia.

A wide array of defenses — some obvious and some not — are expected to be in place when Bush spends about six hours Thursday with the presidents of Colombia, Peru and Bolivia at a heavily guarded naval base near the coastal resort city of Cartagena.

Colombian authorities say about 5,000 security agents will be deployed. Secret Service agents already are in place and more will fly in with Bush.

U. S. warplanes may be used to escort Air Force One and Bush's helicopter. In addition, U. S. warships likely will be stationed in the Caribbean to provide support.

"It's a serious environment to deal with," said William A. Hawthorne, who retired from the Secret Service in 1987 as executive assistant to the director.

"The fact that they're going tells me the Secret Service believes they can provide security in that environment. I'm not particularly worried," Hawthorne said.

Eight years ago, when Bush was visiting Colombia as vice president, a cache of dynamite was found buried along the runway at Bogota international airport after his plane took off.

The Defense Ministry speculated at the time that leftist guerrillas had planted the explosives days earlier but were thwarted by security from getting close enough to detonate the dynamite on the day Bush left.

Brushing aside security concerns, Bush says he wants to go to Colombia as an expression of support for its president, Virgilio Barco, who is waging war against the country's drug lords.

Coast Guard monitor never saw tanker before Valdez oil disaster

ANCHORAGE, Alaska (AP) — The Coast Guard vessel monitor who was on duty when the Exxon Valdez ran aground testified Monday that he never looked for the tanker on his radar screen before the nation's biggest oil spill.

Soviets call for U. S. cooperation in ocean, space arms control

OTTAWA (AP) — The Soviet Union challenged the United States on Monday to extend superpower cooperation in arms control surveillance to the high seas and to space.

Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze, addressing the opening of a 23-nation "Open Skies" conference, also accused the United States of bolstering its naval strength even while agreeing to cut ground forces and land-based missiles.

"Let us face the truth," Shevardnadze said. "Today, the easiest way to launch a surprise attack, a military invasion or an aggression is from the seas."

U. S. officials dismissed the idea, telling reporters in a separate briefing that Washington was not interested in a naval arms control agreement and that surveillance flights already are allowed over oceans and in space.

Choice for sex offenders: castration or prison term

OLYMPIA, Wash. (AP) — The Washington Senate on Monday narrowly passed a measure allowing sex offenders to choose castration in exchange for reducing their sentences by as much as 75 percent.

The bill was approved 25-23 and sent to the House where Speaker Joe King said the measure probably won't come up before next year.

"We just don't know if we're ready to experiment on the public yet," King said.

The measure, and other legislation aimed at repeat sex offenders, is the Legislature's reaction to recent crimes, including the sexual mutilation of a 7-year-old Tacoma boy.

Senate critics accused backers of the bill of showing "blood lust" and said such a law would dump unrepentant sex criminals back on the streets years earlier than if they were to serve full prison terms. They predicted the courts would throw out such a law.

But sponsors said studies have shown castration to cut repeat crime by 75 percent or more.

"Mutilation is too good for these people," said

New Regents

Chapa, Basha have opportunity to help Arizona grow

Brian Tassinari
Opinion Editor

Dear Messrs. Chapa and Basha:
I am writing this letter to you as a graduating senior who has spent the last four and a half years of his life at ASU. I've lived in dorms, a fraternity house and an off-campus apartment. I've driven to school and walked to school and had more majors than I care to admit. So, I think I've got a pretty good perspective on what it is like to be an undergraduate at ASU.

First, I would like to congratulate you on your nomination by Gov. Rose Mofford to the Arizona Board of Regents (pending confirmation by the Senate).

Since confirmation is probably a sure thing, I'm going to assume you're both already in.

I doubt that this appointment comes as a complete surprise to either of you, so I'm sure you have had some time to think about your new job. Of course, you both realize that as members of the board, the decisions you make will have a profound effect on the lives of thousands of students in the next eight years.

So, I hope you have accepted this position because you have the ideas and the energy to make a significant contribution to higher education in Arizona — not because it is a position of power and prestige.

It is encouraging that you, Mr. Basha, have a long history of involvement in local education. And Mr. Chapa, I know you have served on the Arizona State Community College Board. Does this mean you are committed to quality education in Arizona?

To be an excellent regent, you are encouraged to participate in ASASU's "A day in the life of an ASU student" program. It is important for you to remember that all your budget figures, goal reports and meetings don't mean anything if students aren't receiving a good education at the state's three universities.

Over the past few years, the university system has been saddled with a myriad of new goals — from becoming major research institutions to aiding the economic development of communities. Please remember that while these are worthwhile objectives, without a solid undergraduate program, a university has nothing.

Remember too, that you are public servants charged with judiciously spending the public's money for higher education. You are not members of a private club that is given hundreds of millions of dollars by the Legislature to build your own little kingdom.

Conduct your business in the public eye. Unlike some of your fellow board members, have respect for the public's right to know where its money is being spent. Education is the largest single expense that the state has, so don't be surprised when the Legislature routinely examines university affairs.

When this happens, become an advocate of education — not so you will have more money to spend, but so students will be given the best possible education the state of Arizona can offer.

Mr. Basha and Mr. Chapa, don't waste the money you do get on frivolous lawsuits designed to protect your right to secrecy. And if you make such an error, be big enough to admit you were wrong. Certainly don't compound the error with an expensive appeal.

Remember too, you have a constitutional mandate to provide an education to the residents of Arizona that is as nearly free as possible. If that mandate is in jeopardy then cut ruthlessly from extras like faculty clubs and satellite campuses — not classes and faculty.

Messrs. Basha and Capa, you've been given the opportunity by our governor to help shape the future of higher education in the state, please don't let us down.

Students should learn practical math

Editor:

Brian Tassinari's editorial in the Jan. 30 edition of the State Press wasn't right on target but it did come close. Yes, NAU students, and in fact all college students, should be required to prove their math ability before they're given a degree from an institution of higher learning. However, forcing students to take yet another algebra course may not be the best answer. In fact, it could be the worst answer. Let me offer a non-math analogy for those who break out in hives whenever even the word "polynomial" is spoken.

How many of us learned how to write in, say, a junior high school grammar class? To be sure, most of the people reading these words have diagrammed umpteen prepositional phrases and located many direct objects in the course of their schooling, but did that teach them how to read and write? No, of course it didn't. Relaxing and writing taught them how to read and write; diagramming prepositional phrases taught them how to ditch English or copy off neighboring students' papers on tests (I say this as an ex-copy-ee, not copier). In fact, I doubt if the years students spent learning "grammar" taught them as much as the weeks (hours, minutes?) they spent writing essays. You learn far more from the concrete application of the English language than you ever do studying abstract bits and pieces of it best left to the linguists, or to those who wish to become linguists. A returned paper covered with red marks will teach students much more about the application of English than 10 million properly diagrammed direct objects ever could.

Now apply the same logic to math. We spend years teaching our children the "grammar" of math, usually without ever relating it to the concrete universe we live in. The closest most students will ever come is high school geometry class, and that isn't very close. Instead of wasting college students valuable time teaching them the naked grammar of math, why don't we have them learn through applying math? By all means have a college math requirement, and physics, for example, both present wonderful, concrete ways to learn algebra. Offer "math" courses which teach math not by the memorization of the grammar of math, the formulas and theorems, but through the application of math upon the physical universe, teaching math via science. Give people something, from figuring out what happened in a chemical reaction to figuring out how much fuel a rocket would take to get to the moon.

Police report in error

Editor:

The police report in the Feb. 5 edition of the State Press contained a false report that alcohol was "seized" from the Arizona State Lacrosse Club during the game played on Feb. 3 against Princeton.

We have been unjustly cast in a negative light by this incident and wish to set the record straight.

Alcoholic beverages were taken from some individuals in attendance, but, the incident did not involve any lacrosse team members. The people named in the report are not affiliated with Arizona State

We are not faulting the State Press or reporter Mike Burgess, with the error. The fault lies with the inaccurate report filed by an ASU police officer. We feel a correction in his report is in order.

The problem has been brought before the Dean of Student Life who supports the lacrosse team in this matter.

Will freeing Mandela end state of emergency?

Cody Shearer
North American Syndicate

WASHINGTON — Ted Koppel of ABC News' popular "Nightline" program is already in South Africa. Mike Wallace of CBS' "Sixty Minutes" news magazine is preparing to catch the next flight to Capetown the moment he receives permission to interview Mandela.

No one likes to talk about the intense battle in South Africa and abroad for media control of the Nelson Mandela story and access to the great man because it is an unseemly business. One need only have waited for hours, amid the crush of journalists outside the gates of the Victor Verster Prison the other day, to have appreciated the ferociousness of the competition.

A certain amount of pushing and shoving ensued among the journalists as Mrs. Mandela entered the prison. The journalists tried to be gentle with one another in the scorching heat but it was to no avail. When Mrs. Mandela reappeared several hours later at the prison gates, the press broke ranks behind security guard lines, and became instant anarchists, all in an attempt to get within hearing distance of the woman of the hour. The cameramen and soundmen, with sharpened elbows for the assignment, muscled each other to corner the best angles.

What few will admit is that the competition for Mandela and the timing of his release has as much to do with the selling of his story as it does with the political preconditions Mandela wants Pretoria to guarantee, such as ending the current state of emergency.

It is well-known in the anti-apartheid community in South Africa that Winnie Mandela intends to use the release of her husband to re-establish the reputation she enjoyed before last year's scandal over her bodyguards and the alleged murder of Stompie Moeketsi. At that time, Winnie's guards were accused of torturing children in Soweto township, which led to one death.

In order to remake her image, Mrs. Mandela wants control over the millions of dollars that her husband's story will bring. In this effort, she's retained Dr. Alain Guenon, a former philosophy professor at the Sorbonne. Dr. Guenon owns a Johannesburg news agency, which supplies game shows aimed at black audiences to South African state television.

Winnie Mandela's relationship with Guenon and the deals the two are negotiating has greatly upset the internal leadership of the African National Congress. On the one hand, the Mass Democratic Movement, which is the front organization for the ANC within South Africa, has been handling arrangements for Mandela's prison release. It has even rented offices in central Johannesburg for the use of the veteran ANC leader, who has served more than 27 years behind bars.

The eternal struggle between a public figure's organization and the wife are legendary. But in the Mandela case these tensions have become quite bitter. Perhaps President F. W. de Klerk knew what he was talking about the other day when he said that, although the government had decided to release Mandela unconditionally, "there are factors in the way of his immediate release, of which his personal circumstances and safety are not the least."

In an authorized biography published in England this week, Nelson Mandela reveals that he suffered deep depression and came close to going insane while in prison in South Africa. Often he wondered whether his sacrifices had been worthwhile.

"The worst part of imprisonment is being locked up by yourself," Mandela says in "Higher Than Hope," co-written by Farima Meer, a sociology professor at the University of Natal. "You come face-to-face with time and there is nothing more terrifying than to be alone with sheer time. Then the ghosts come crowding in. They can be very sinister, very mischievous, raising a thousand doubts in your mind about the people outside, their loyalty."

American officials in Washington won't talk about it, but internal reports within the Defense Intelligence Agency reveal that U. S. troops participated in some of the widespread looting during the early days of the U. S. invasion of Panama last December. Besides liberating objects from department stores, U. S. troops stole many of Noriega's personal belongings and in some cases, have sold them.

Housing costs are so high in San Francisco that local school officials are finding that it's nearly impossible for an aspiring teacher to relocate in the region. After all, the average home in San Francisco costs $316,000. In order to correct imbalances in the market place, school officials in the area are preparing to build homes on school land so that new teachers will have a place to live for several years before having to purchase their own place.

The average wage-earner in this country paid $1,514.20 last year in social securities taxes. These funds were meant to provide for at least half of the total income for 61 percent of the elderly population, according to the Social Security Administration. The average monthly benefit for retired workers was $537 in 1988.

The Chinese government is so desperate to revive its dormant tourist industry, in light of the disturbing events in Peking last June, that its vice-chairman of national tourism, He Guangwei, intends to propose a new law that would enable tourists to sue enterprises that offer poor guides and unprofessional staff.

A third of all Americans never spend any time focusing on personal financial planning, according to the Oppenheimer Funds Survey of Individual Investors. The results say that 60 percent of the population admits to spending less than three hours a month on personal savings and investments. People who earn the most spend the most time deciding how to invest their loot.

Safer for democracy does not mean safe for living

Jeff Greenfield

LONDON — The five men and women working the special security table at London's Heathrow Airport are polite, good-natured, but very business-like. If the detector shows something — anything — out of the ordinary, the bag is moved to a back table, well out of the reach of passengers, and is then gone through methodically.

There is an occasional embarrassing moment, when a young woman may be asked to identify, with precision, everything she is carrying in her makeup kit. But there is no grumbling from the passengers. This, after all, is the airport from which Pan Am 103 departed little more than a year ago.

Watching the guards go through my bag, I remembered that last May, leaving Amsterdam, a security guard trained for TWA by El Al airlines asked some very pointed questions. Why are you carrying a one-way ticket; why did you change your plans once you arrived in Amsterdam; would you mind showing me how your tape player works and where the batteries are?

There was no grumbling here, either. The airport at Amsterdam had been the scene of a murderous massacre back in the 1970s.

I am on my way to South Africa to cover what may be the most hopeful story in that nation's history: the possible release of Nelson Mandela and — even more significant, or just as significant — the first real attempt by the white minority government to make the black majority part of the political process.

This is happening at the moment when the leader of the Soviet Union is seriously proposing to do the unthinkable: to abolish the political monopoly of the Soviet Communist Party.

A hopeful mind might be forgiven the notion that the political millennium is at hand, that oppression by the state is about to be relegated to the dust bin of history.

There is, however, another reality. The power to disturb the peace, to impose suffering on innocent human beings, has never been the exclusive province of the state. And the ease of worldwide travel and the ubiquity of weapons has made entrepreneurial terrorism a growth industry.

Shadow groups funded by one nation-state or another, or by their own hands, can procure the means to blow an airliner out of the sky. A busload of tourists in the Middle East is easy prey for a sect determined to destroy whatever prospects for peace in that region exist.

In the Soviet Union, long believed to enjoy the stability that comes with an absolute rule, the implosion of communism has spurred old hatreds to the point that civil war — literal civil war — is a reality in at least one Soviet republic.

There is a cautionary tale in all this: a reminder that freedom is a means, not an end. The collapse of state hegemony and a dozen former tyrannies is splendid news, but it hardly foreshadows an end to horrific conflict and pain.

White neo-nazis in South Africa clearly have the power to render null and void the potential miracle of a settlement between the government and disparate black groups competing for political power. Five years ago in Pretoria, I witnessed a rally complete with home-grown storm troopers and custom-made swastikas. Those people mean it.

Black militants have similar power. In the black townships, even a rumor of collaboration with white authorities can mean horrible death at the hands of the "comrades." Nelson Mandela himself cannot be assured his own personal safety if some believe he has "sold out" black aspirations for real political power.

Throughout the world, national and tribal sects can inflict their own pain. Anwar Sadat, who made war in the Middle East much less likely with his 1973 treaty with Israel, paid for it with his life.

Does a similar fate await a leader in democratic Bulgaria who does not properly oppress the despised Turks?

Will a free Soviet Union tolerate, even encourage, the flourishing of nationalistic movements with deep suspicions of "cosmopolitan" (read Jewish) figures in the Soviet Union?

And, should the spirit of freedom and reconciliation spread to other parts of the globe, will those who reject such a future turn their guns on civilian targets — on school buses, at airplanes, in shopping centers?

For months, the headlines in the papers and the images on the TV screens have painted a hopeful picture of the world. But those sharp-eyed security guards at Heathrow Airport serve as a reminder that making the world safer for democracy does not necessarily mean making the world safe.

ASU president to urge regents to finalize club plans

By TENNY TATUSIAN
State Press

ASU President Lattie Coor said he will urge the Arizona Board of Regents during its April meeting to finalize plans for the controversial University Club, an on-campus dining facility for faculty and staff members.

"I believe very strongly in the value of such a club," ASU's top man said.

Coor added that he supports the proposal of using University funds as a loan to finance the project.

"I don't oppose the use of University funds that are part of an overall plan to make the club finance itself in the future," Coor said.

Associated Students of ASU President Paul Larson disagreed with Coor's perception of the club funding.

"Although it is a loan, it is not an appropriate source for those funds," Larson said.

Coor said he removed the issue from the regents' January agenda because he did not fully understand the financial planning for the multimillion-dollar project.

"I don't want anything to go forward until I understand the issue completely," he added. "And I haven't done that yet. I want to make sure that the plans and the predictable reality match."

Coor said he will look into the issue thoroughly before bringing it up before the regents in April.

The regents voted unanimously at its January meeting for initial approval of $1.7 million in ASU investment income to fund the University Club. The board delayed voting on the proposal in October, claiming the club funding needed more research.

Of the $1.7 million approved, $885,000 was pre-designated by former ASU president J. Russell Nelson for stabilization of the 82-year-old Fine Arts Annex, the building planned to house the University Club.

The remaining $830,500 will be used to redecorate the building and to add dining facilities.

In addition, parking services will fund $49,100 for a new parking lot and surrounding landscaping.

The club intends to pay back University capital investments, according to University Club board directors.

The club will turn over membership dues and monthly fees to the University until the debt is erased.

A report by Pannell Kerr Forster, consultants who did research on the club, shows that the University will be repaid if the club opens with 600 members and attracts 100 new members each subsequent year for five years.

"No one has addressed the fact that the club will lose money every year," Larson said. "There has been no acknowledgement or mechanism put in place to deal with that. When the club does lose money every year, who is going to pay for that?"

Faculty and staff members must pay a $25 initiation fee, a $300 renovation contribution and $12 each month, year-round, in membership fees. Community members may join by paying a $200 membership fee and a $300 renovation contribution. Their monthly fees have not yet been determined.

The club proposal must now go through project approval from the board. Construction plans have to be finalized and the food contract has to be put out to bid.

"I've had several people who say that when they go out to bid for food service vendors there is no way they can do it with their (the University Club) budget," Larson said. "The club is still on very shaky ground."

Applicants for Public Programs College Council to meet

By DAN NOWICKI
State Press

An informational meeting for students interested in serving on the College of Public Programs College Council will be held tomorrow at 3 p.m. in Stauffer 237.

The Council election will be held Thursday at the same time and place. All five executive Council positions will be filled.

"I think its going to be pretty big," said Michelle Neilson,

Associated Students of ASU College Council coordinator. "Sue Blumer, who's an assistant to the dean, is going to be there so we'll hope they'll be a large turnout."

Neilson also stressed the importance of student participation in the College Council.

"Being on the College Council gives you the opportunity to interact with the alumni, the faculty and with students who share similar interests," Neilson said. "And it's an opportunity to work with student government."

Neilson said there have been no problems with the Council for the past two and a half years.

"It's been a great College Council and they've done a great job," Neilson said. "It's just time for elections and we're helping them out."

The five executive positions on the Council that are open for election are president, executive vice president, secretary, public relations officer and alumni relations officer.

Washington fraternity suspended after initiation incident with sheep

A University of Washington fraternity was suspended in late January after residents were found semi-clothed and in the company of two sheep during initiation rites at their house.

UWs' Interfraternity Council suspended the Theta Xi fraternity Jan. 24, even before the Seattle Animal Control Board finished its investigation into the matter.

"The evidence presented clearly demonstrates (Theta Xi members') guilt and complete insensitivity to hazing and animal rights," according to a statement issued by the IFC, which refused to list the exact charges brought against the house or to comment on whether the sheep had been sodomized.

"It sounds like the stuff movies are made of," said Jonathon Brant, head of the Indianapolis-based National Interfraternity Council. "It makes me think of the movie 'Animal House.' This is clearly against NIC rules and completely inappropriate."

Seattle police responding to a call Jan. 12 found pledges wearing only underwear. Some had white grease on their hands and peanut butter smeared on their bodies. The officers reported that the sheep appeared "overheated and agitated."

The sheep and pledges were in a room with a sign on the door that read, "Nobody allowed except actives, pledges with permission and cloven-hooved animals."

Police turned the animals over to the Seattle Animal Control Department, which will issue a report in early February on whether or not the sheep were abused.

Theta Xi members were unavailable for comments.

Campus corporate pizza deal forces 2 local shops to close

A meal plan at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill that lets students charge pizzas ordered from certain stores has forced two local businesses to close and has another one thinking about suing.

The meal plan has "hurt the entire community," said Doug Hampton, owner of University Pizza, one of three Chapel Hill pizzerias excluded from UNC's dorm delivery pizza business.

Two of those businesses — Hungry Howie's and Checker's — have gone out of business.

Under the plan, students can have pizza from certain stores delivered to their campus rooms and charge the cost to their school food service accounts.

Local pizza business owners say the arrangement effectively helps huge national corporations like Domino's and Pizza Hut put mom-and-pop competitors out of business.

The Marriott Corporation's Carolina Dining Services, which runs UNC's food service, started the controversy in 1988, when it signed a deal with Domino's Pizza to let students charge pizzas they ordered from the local Domino's outlet. The pact excluded other kinds of pizzas from the plan.

After other companies complained, Marriott reopened the bid process for the right to sell pizza to Chapel Hill students, eventually adding Pizza Hut and Gumby's, a local pizzeria whose owner had threatened to sue Carolina Food Services.

The corporation hasn't heard any complaints about hurting local business, Marriott spokeswoman Kathy Boyle said.

New York, Washington students mount protests on tuition hikes

Trying to keep the lid on annual tuition hikes, students at Pacific Lutheran University in Washington and Syracuse University in New York spent a week protesting proposed increases.

At Pacific Lutheran, where administrators proposed raising prices next school year by 11.6 percent to $10,449, about 900 students signed a petition blasting the proposed hike, the largest one in four years.

The proposed increase "is for more money than they need to run the University effectively," student government President Brian Slater said.

Students at Syracuse finished a week-long boycott Feb. 2 of the school's main dining facility and bookstores to protest a 9.94 percent increase, which will bring the cost of tuition to $11,728.

"We are trying to impose economic sanctions upon the University," boycott organizer Carl Shidlow said.

Syracuse spokesman Darryl Geddes dismissed the protest, saying the boycott "does not seem helpful to the cause of the students who seek a quality education at reasonably controlled tuition levels."

The demonstrations could be the beginning of another round of protests similar to last year, when students at the University of New Mexico, Rutgers University in New Jersey and the City University of New York system reacted angrily to announcements of tuition hikes.

University of Akron president bans campus parties after fights

No more parties will be held at the University of Akron, President William Muse said in response to two recent bashes that ended in fights.

"We cannot tolerate this type of behavior," Muse said.

Muse banned parties at the school's student center, residence halls and five houses the University leases to sororities and fraternities.

Muse said he will consider lifting the ban when more stringent regulations are adopted to ensure better student conduct.

Standardized test opponents gain key support as movement

The anti-SAT movement gained more steam as the leaders of almost 50 national education groups called on schools to stop giving students standardized multiple-choice tests.

The groups, organized by FairTest, a Cambridge, Mass., critic of the Scholastic Aptitude Test, urged schools to create "performance portfolios" to replace standardized tests as measures of students' educational progress.

Such a change would drastically alter the way colleges make admissions decisions.

Gretchen Young, assistant dean of admissions at Georgia State University, said scores from standardized tests help make fair judgments on potential students' success. She predicted GSU would put more emphasis on students' high school courses, grade point averages and extracurricular activities if test scores were abolished.

Monty Neil of FairTest said that by relying on multiple-choice test scores, many high schools have switched to teaching students how to pass memory tests instead of teaching them how to think.

"Many high schools hire coaches (to help with the tests), and there is growing pressure in English and math classes to teach only what is on the tests," he said.

FairTest, along with groups such as the American Federation of Teachers, Council for Basic Education and the Institute for Learning and Teaching, proposed that schools do away with worksheets and drills in favor of more hands-on projects.

The Valley of the Sun chapter of the United Way receives a check for $177,302.37 from ASU employees on Monday.

ASU staff exceeds goal with $177,000 for charity

By GREMLYN BRADLEY
State Press

The Valley of the Sun chapter of the United Way received a check Monday for $177,302.37, the result of ASU's employees and their efforts to make the 1989-1990 campaign a success.

The monetary goal for the campaign, which began last August, was $175,000.

"Every one of us at ASU can feel proud, showing how much we care about our fellow people," said campaign co-chairwoman Susan Clouse at the awards ceremony, held Monday afternoon in the Student Services amphitheater.

David R. Gourley, an ASU professor of marketing, and Donald R. Campbell from University Relations at the ASU West Campus were also co-chairmen.

The successful efforts of this year's record-breaking campaign, themed "A Race We All Can Win," did not go unnoticed by ASU President Lattie Coor.

"I am a happy and pleased observer... as one who's had the pleasure of running a campaign in a previous incarnation."

ASU's former Interim President Richard Peck said he was "impressed with the record that was set."

Joe Haggarty, president of the Valley of the Sun United Way, said the campaign was "a tremendous accomplishment."

"We really want to thank the people at ASU," he said.

According to Haggarty, the money will be used to provide various services throughout the Valley.

As a participant in Phoenix's Boys & Girls Club, Anthony Arellanes has used services made possible by United Way. The junior from Brophy Preparatory High School in Phoenix thanked contributors for their "solemn commitment to help a kid like me."

"I am your future... and you are leading that generation to greatness."

Arellanes said he was speaking for "kids — the soul of America."

Steve Patterson, the campaign chairman, said the committee's goal was to increase the 1988-1989 goal of $160,000 by 10 percent.

"It was a very ambitious goal," he said. "But today is a day that history is made."

ASU departments, or units, were in competition to raise the most money. Awarded for 100 percent participation in her unit of 20 or more employees was Donna Richardson, who headed the Undergraduate Admissions unit.

For 100 percent participation in units of less than 20, the following were awarded: Sarah Butterfield, College of Engineering and Applied Sciences dean's office; Reba Wilson, Curriculum and Instruction; Lillie Johnson, University Library; Kristi McFarland, Leisure Studies; Gwen Weaver, College of Public Programs and Cathy Mayorga, ASU West Provost Office.

Rich Flaherty, heading the School of Accountancy's unit, had a 61 percent participation rate and raised $191.90.

The highest contribution from an ASU department with 20 or more employees was $7,883.26 from Computing Services, headed by Jeannette Robson.

Other large contributions from departments with more than 20 employees and over 50 percent participation were $4,857.96 from Intercollegiate Athletics, headed by Richard Wanniger and $2,826.72 from University Relations, headed by Renee Bolduc.

A "Bed Race" last semester also helped the campaign. The race, in which campus social groups raised $2,000, was coordinated by graduate student Ann Johnston.

"It (the campaign's results) whets our appetite for another successful year," Coor said.

ideology off campus and into Maricopa County Superior Court.

The Arizona Civil Liberties Union filed a lawsuit in October against the Arizona Board of Regents and former Interim President Richard Peck demanding the removal of the Danforth Chapel cross.

The group claims University support of the symbol defies the establishment clause of the U. S. constitution, which calls for a separation of church and state.

The hearings on the case were held Friday and a decision on the fate of the cross is expected this week.

While the eyes of the court focused on the blazing arguments of the organizations involved in the suit, it is the feelings of the students that kindled the original fire.

McNeil is working with the ACLU, along with fellow student Monty Gaither, ASU English Professor Randell Helms and Law Professor David Kader, in an effort to remove the religious symbol.

Martin joined freshman Heather Kimes, a justice studies major, and sophomore Crystal McCoy, a theater major, as intervening defendants who are fighting to save the religious symbol.

McNeil said that as an atheist, he is personally offended by the display of the cross, a Christian symbol.

"Because this is a predominantly Christian area, people don't realize that it (the cross) does offend people," McNeil said. "They may have grown up with a cross in every room, but other people haven't."

He added that the Danforth cross "is a validation that the Christian religion is the only accepted religion."

The 31-year-old graduate student grew up in a middle-class East Coast Lutheran home. He said he terminated his religious beliefs while studying philosophy as an undergraduate in a Connecticut college.

"There is no proof that God exists, that any God exists," McNeil said. "They (philosophers) made a lot more sense than any religion."

Martin grew up in a poor family in Nogales, an Arizona border town. His mother had to support five children off his deceased father's veteran's benefits.

He said that while his strict Baptist upbringing taught him to respect the cross, it is his Hispanic heritage that warrants the display of the symbol.

"The cross as a part of our culture is very prominent; it's part of who we are," he said. "I, as a Hispanic, look at it as a piece of art."

"I view the taking down of the cross as an attack on Christianity and a part of the Hispanic culture," Martin said.

He said he believes the removal of the cross would set back the University's attempts to integrate cultural diversity on the campus.

"I think the state is in itself saying it wants to have a part of every culture on campus, but they're taking part of it down," he said.

Martin said he tolerates other religions on campus and that others should demonstrate the same by leaving the cross intact.

"The cross does not keep anyone from going in there (the chapel), it does not say 'please do not come in here if you are Jewish or Islamic'," Martin said. "It doesn't bother me when they wear their caps (yamulkas) on campus."

Martin and McNeil have done all they can. Now the plaintiff and defendant can only wait patiently while their beliefs are examined by the legal system.

If the cross is not removed "I'd be very disappointed," McNeil said. "There are no legal grounds for it to be up there."

Martin said he too would be upset if the cross were taken down, but not discouraged.

"My Christian walk is not going to be affected because my beliefs are set in God," he said.

state had no concrete plans to deal with two issues vital to Arizona's survival and prosperity — water and transportation.

According to Mecham, a proposal he initiated for a regional airport near Coolidge would have come close to dealing with the water situation. The state-of-the-art airport, he said, would be connected to Phoenix and Tucson by a high-speed railway.

"We can become the next step to the East after Los Angeles," he said. "If I had not been removed from office, construction would have begun on the airport."

Mecham, who began a 50-year water program while in office, said the government cannot plot a future for Arizona without plans to supply everyone with enough water.

"It is not enough to say that people can buy their water elsewhere," he said.

Mecham said the primary political body to deal with issues that directly affect Arizonans should be local government.

"Responsive government should center in the cities," he said. "It is the way the system was meant to be."

Mandela

Nazi Afrikaner Resistance Movement, said de Klerk is now powerless to control Mandela, and he warned that his movement "will protect itself and its property when the government can no longer do so."

Mandela said whites should not fear the prospect of an ANC-led government.

"Whites are fellow South Africans. We want them to feel safe," he said at his news conference. "The ANC... will find a solution that will suit both blacks and whites."

The ANC seeks a one-person, one-vote system, which would be dominated by South Africa's 28 million blacks. De Klerk seeks to negotiate a new constitution that would establish some political rights for blacks, but provide the 5 million whites with some sort of veto over major decisions.

Police have reported about 40 deaths in unrest around the country since daybreak Sunday, including a clash between police and looters in Cape Town that left one black dead and more than 100 people injured.

Tutu, in an unusual move, issued a statement deploring the looting and refraining from criticism of the police. Other activists appealed to blacks to welcome Mandela in a dignified, non-violent manner.

Summit

"And I believe... that the security of the president can be protected on this naval base, a place where the man (Barco) has his own home that is cut off from the mainland except by one entrance," Bush said last week.

Jerry Parr, who was head of President Ronald Reagan's protective detail, said that on a scale of 1 to 10, the danger to Bush was "probably a seven or an eight."

"It's risky to be president," said Parr, who in 1981 shoved wounded Reagan into a limousine and rushed him to a hospital after an assassination attempt. "You can't reduce all the risks."

"Anytime you take the president out of the United States, it's got a lot of unknowns about it, despite the fact you're going to do everything you can," Parr said.

Typically, the Secret Service sets up three concentric rings of security for the president: an intensely guarded inner circle, a middle circle and an outer perimeter, Parr said.

"The whole game will be to minimize the danger and reduce the killers' or the assassins' options. Since he is going, the Secret Service really has thought it out well," Parr said.

Decoy limousines and helicopters have become standard fare in presidential security. Last week in San Francisco, a decoy motorcade of a half dozen cars was used to fool raucous demonstrators who were trying to haze the president.

The Secret Service also can change travel routes and arrival areas and stage diversions and distractions, former agents say.

"There's going to be some razzle dazzle so people aren't quite clear about who to attack," said Chuck Vance, who helped guard Gerald Ford when he was president and also served on two vice presidential protective details.

"They'll have military personnel everywhere: frogmen, ships, aircraft," Vance said. "I called in a whole (naval) fleet one time in a Moroccan visit for (then Vice President Spiro) Agnew" because of political uncertainties.

Castration

Sen. Brad Owen. "It should be mandatory for these creeps."

"No one mentions cruel and unusual punishment of the citizens," agreed Sen. Bob McCaslin.

Both houses have approved tough sex-crimes legislation suggested by a citizens task force appointed by Gov. Booth Gardner. Informal negotiations are under way to iron out the differences.

That legislation includes stiffer sentences, a procedure for civil commitment of incorrigible sex offenders and more services for victims.

Sen. Ellen Craswell, sponsor of the castration bill, and her Senate allies contend those efforts aren't enough.

Surgical castration "does affect violent behavior. The lowering of testosterone level affects violence," said Craswell, referring to a male sex hormone. She said she prefers life sentences for sex criminals.

Foes of the castration bill said it won't survive constitutional scrutiny on Eighth Amendment grounds of cruel and unusual punishment. They noted the South Carolina Supreme Court so ruled in the case of three rapists offered the option in exchange for suspended sentences.

Craswell's measure includes provisions for court hearings before to castration to ensure the offender understands the legal, medical, emotional and psychological consequences of surgical castration.

The bill would allow a 75 percent reduction from what the sentence normally would be under the standard sentencing range used by judges across the state.

Gardner all but promised a veto if the measure should make it to his desk. Studies don't prove castration is an effective deterrent, and early releases for sex criminals could make the assault rate even worse, he said.

ATLANTIC CITY, N.J. (AP) — Thirteen college students on a weekend splurge spent $10,000 at casinos, restaurants and stores — all in the name of education. They were working on a project from Johnson & Wales University in Providence, R.I., which offers degrees in hospitality and food service, among other subjects, and their mission was to rate the city's tourist attractions.

At a news conference Monday the students announced their rating: 3.5 "pineapples." That falls somewhere between good and very good on a scale of five pineapples — a fruit, according to the school's travel and tourism chairman, that serves as an international symbol of hospitality.

The students — all over the legal drinking and gambling age of 21 — said they didn't venture far from the Boardwalk, partly out of fear of crime. But the only bad experience reported was by one student who said he was pushed around by a bouncer demanding identification.

Some in the industry suggested more experienced testers might have come up with a different score, but Soundra Usry-Hollingsworth, the city's deputy mayor of travel and tourism, was ready for a repeat visit.

"When you come back," she told the students, "I promise you we'll be ready for our five pineapples."

Softball team splits doubleheader with Ducks

Jeorgetta Douglas/State Press

By MATTHEW KASTER
State Press

The 15th-ranked ASU softball team split a doubleheader Monday night against fifth-ranked Oregon. The Sun Devils won the first game 2-0 and then lost the second after three extra innings by a score of 3-0.

It was the Pac-10 opener for the Sun Devils (1-3) and also the conference debut of new ASU Head Coach Linda Wells.

Both teams played exceptional defense throughout the night. ASU set the offensive pace early with second baseman Liz Phillips and shortstop Cheri Keller hitting triples to knock in a run each. Although the Sun Devils were able to score first, tough defensive play by Oregon kept them from extending the lead.

UO also had several scoring opportunities in the first game, but excellent Sun Devil fielding stopped the Ducks short each time. UO was able to put runners in scoring position in the first, fourth and seventh innings, but each time ASU held them scoreless.

The best example of good defensive play came in the last inning of the first game when ASU held off an Oregon seventh-inning rally.

With runners on second and third, shortstop Ann Rowan caught a line drive and then chased down the UO runner on second for a double-play to clinch a 2-0 victory in the first game.

In the second game, the Ducks decided to return with pitcher Katie Wiese, who had come into the first game to relieve starting Anna Poore.

Wiese improved her pitching with the start of the second game, striking out four and staying ahead in the count.

Wiese shut down ASU's hitting, but Oregon was unable to generate any runs against the Sun Devils' defense.

After three extra innings, UO was finally able to drive in three runs with back-to-back doubles by first baseman Tracey Simmons and outfielder Jeanna King.

The Ducks ended ASU's hopes for a rally with a double play in the bottom of the tenth.

Jeorgetta Douglas/State Press

ASU softball pitcher Terri Carnicelli (left) started in the first game of last night's doubleheader against Oregon. The two teams split with the Sun Devils winning the opener 2-0 and losing the nightcap, 3-0, in 10 innings.

Women hoopsters have tough time in California

By KRIS TIMMONS
State Press

The ASU womens basketball team was greatly affected by the flu this weekend in Los Angeles.

Sophomore Shannon Gridley did not play Friday against USC because she was still kept out of action by the flu she had last week.

Then it was senior Carolyn DeHoff's turn. As a result, she was limited to 10 minutes of play and was scoreless against UCLA.

The Sun Devils (11-10 overall, 3-8 Pac-10) fell 90-75 to the Bruins Sunday after dropping a one-point decision to the Trojans Friday. ASU has yet to win a Pac-10 road game in six tries.

Sun Devil Head Coach Maura McHugh said the loss to USC was a disappointment.

"We felt we could win that game," McHugh said. "It came down to the last shot. We were offensively flat, missing shots."

"The game was strange. The shots just didn't drop."

Junior guard Karen O'Connor was the Sun Devils' top scorer for both contests, contributing 14 points in each game.

Freshman forward Jovonne Smith said the loss was a result of poor offense.

"We didn't execute the offense as well as we did in the Oregon State and Oregon games," Smith said. "We didn't have as much intensity."

Smith also said turnovers were a factor. The Sun Devils committed 22 against USC and 20 against UCLA.

Smith scored 22 points on the two-game road trip, but she feels she could have played better.

"I could have helped out more on offensive boards," she said.

"We knew we could beat them," Smith said. "We let them back into the game."

McHugh said that she was pleased with how the freshmen played, especially Smith, adding that she was six-for-eight from the field.

Senior forward Fran Ciak, whose season scoring average is 15.9 points per game, was limited to eight points in each contest.

According to McHugh, Ciak's low scoring has been a result of her being doubled-teamed.

"Teams are concentrating on her more," McHugh said.

Four Sun Devils scored in double figures against UCLA but only Smith and O'Connor were in double figures against USC.

Bruin guard Rehema Stephens had 33 points and 12 rebounds against ASU.

McHugh said that UCLA was "on fire for the first quarter of the game."

The ASU game plan will not change any for future games, according to McHugh, but she will concentrate on making things better.

The Sun Devils will head to Tucson on Friday to take on the Wildcats.

"It's important that we are ready to play," McHugh said. "We have to get offensively on track."

Elvis is more than a fan, he's a 'superfan'

By KRIS TIMMONS
State Press

If you have ever been to an ASU home football game, you have probably seen him. He requires no last name and is often referred to as "Superfan."

He refers to himself as "Mr. ASU, himself."

He is Louie Meyers, a.k.a. Elvis. By day, he is a custodian, but five minutes out of work, Elvis, 45, changes out of his uniform and dons the preferred ASU paraphernalia.

His spectator attire is all Sun Devil, from sunglasses to belt buckle, and changes according to season. In the fall, he supports football. In the spring, he can be seen advertising Bill Frieder basketball.

But he doesn't stop at just football and basketball.

He attends wrestling matches and baseball games, too. And he can be found, media guide in hand, searching out the latest athlete on his list for an autograph. Autograph collecting is just part of being an "average fan," according to Elvis.

He began his role as "Mr. ASU" in 1979 during Frank Kush's reign as head football coach.

"I was a fan first, before I ever went out onto the field," Elvis said.

From then on, his role at ASU just got bigger.

"I see all the fans and I talk with them before the (football) game," he said. "And I go right on into the locker room to talk with the troops and then we are out on the field again."

Elvis is probably most famous for running out onto the field to remove the kickoff tee during football games.

After former ASU Athletic Director Fred Miller and present Assistant Athletic Director Herman Frazier saw a "superfan" at a professional football game, Elvis said he was asked to become a permanent fixture at the Sun Devil games.

However, ex-Head Coach John Cooper saw Elvis' excessive weight as a liability. If he didn't drop the weight, he would be banned from the field for the 1988-89 season.

Elvis didn't drop the weight, so he was banned.

Sun Devil fan Deb Lumbardo said, "After he was banned from the football games, I quit going. He was better than the cheerleaders."

"For a non-student," Lumbardo added, "he sets a good example of school spirit."

Elvis said that being banned from the field bothered him at first.

"Of course, a lot of the fans saw me up in the stands," Elvis said. "He (Cooper) made sure I had tickets for the games."

Elvis also received a ring from the Sun Devils' trip to the Rose Bowl.

"I'll treasure that for my life," Elvis said producing the ring.

In October, Elvis plans to marry Carmen Sternik, his girlfriend of 13 years. Elvis said the marriage will not affect his participation in ASU sports and that Carmen will attend the games with Elvis.

Elvis has no plans to stop being "Mr. ASU" anytime soon.

Tyson, Douglas to fight again this summer

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Entrepreneur Donald Trump said Monday he has an agreement with promoter Don King to stage a rematch between Buster Douglas and Mike Tyson on June 18 in Atlantic City, according to a published report.

Douglas knocked out the previously unbeaten Tyson in the 10th round on Saturday night in Tokyo in one of the greatest upsets in boxing history.

"We made the deal a little while ago," Trump said in Tuesday's editions of The New York Times.

Dan Klores, a spokesman for Trump, told the Associated Press "I have no idea. I haven't heard anything about it."

The World Boxing Association and World Boxing Council withheld awarding their heavyweight championship belts to Douglas after Tyson and King said that referee Octavio Meyran took too long to count out Douglas after an 8th-round knockdown.

The International Boxing Federation, however, has given its belt to Douglas.

Gary Selesner, an executive at Trump Plaza, told The Times "We are the site of the bout. The only snag is King has to sign Douglas and (Evander) Holyfield."

Holyfield, the top-ranked contender, was originally scheduled to fight Tyson in Atlantic City on June 18.

King told the newspaper "We don't have a deal yet."

WBC Vice President Dr. Elias Ghanem, who supervised the heavyweight title fight between Douglas and Tyson, says Douglas should be declared the champion because he won the title in the ring.

Ghanem also said Monday that the presidents of both the WBC and WBA were told between the eighth and ninth rounds that the referee had made a mistake in the count, but took no action.

"Nobody did anything," Ghanem said. "The fight went on."

Ghanem said because Douglas went on to knock Tyson out and was declared the winner by the referee, he is the new champion.

"Douglas knocked Tyson out and that's a fact," Ghanem said. "I gave Douglas the belt after the fight and that's it as far as I'm concerned."

Ghanem said he would resist any efforts by the WBC executive committee, of which he is a member, to try and give the title back to Tyson or declare it vacant when it meets in Mexico City on Feb. 20.

Another committee member and the WBC's international secretary, Duane Ford, went even further, saying he would resign if the WBC did not recognize Douglas as its champion.

"Buster Douglas is the champion and they need to give the belt to him officially," Ford said. "If the WBC reverses this decision I'm long gone from this organization."

Ford, also warned that the WBC would be making a "fatal, fatal mistake" if it does not name Douglas its champion.

"If they reverse the decision on this one, the WBC and WBA can pack their tents and fold them," he said. "I think they're finished."

Both Ford and Ghanem are members of the Nevada State Athletic Commission.

"I'm ashamed to admit I'm even associated with boxing now," Ford said.
